Dissertation: “Approaching Cadavers: Suicide and Depression in the African Diaspora”
Short abstract: My dissertation explores how one can and should understand black wellbeing in a world structured by racism and coloniality. Through a social account of psychiatry or “sociodiagnostics,” this project examines depression and suicide within the African diaspora. Employing existential phenomenology, Africana philosophy, and psychiatric models, I argue that Afro-diasporic subjects face systematic un-wellness under “disordered” socio-political arrangements. By accounting for the exogenous causes and lived-experience of people with mental disorders, I then demonstrate how the treatment of depression demands not only psychiatric intervention but also social restructuring.
